Uncovering The Truth About Careers

Arguably, getting work experience is the best way to get a feel for what a career is like. Working with children will be different than associating with engineers. And on-the-job experience can help you figure out whether you'd like to participate in energized meetings all day or sit at a desk in a remote cubicle.

Of course, it takes awhile to get solid, relevant experience; but internships, volunteer work, and entry-level jobs are a start. Employers value the skills learned through such experiences. Besides, it could be your stepping stone to a permanent position.

Don't Be Fooled

It's one thing to read about what you'll do in a particular career, but it's better to base your perceptions on your own experiences; they're least likely to fool you. Observe the people in the job you want. Listen and learn. View every career opportunity as the chance to get the inside track on the career you covet.
